Alice Hummel and Ray's WW II comrades provided information for this summary.

A comprehensive perspective of Ray's magnificent leadership emerges from a newspaper article that Alice received shortly after the regiment returned to Nottingham from Normandy. The source and publication of this article is unknown, but eyewitnesses confirm the contents. The article is paraphrased as follows.

Ray Hummel Did Brilliant Work Early in the Invasion

On June 6, 1944 shortly after the perilous drop into Normandy, Raymond Hummel, a Staff Sergeant, gathered a group of 36 parachutists from Hq1 and companies of the 508th PIR and various other airborne units. As the senior noncommissioned officer, he led the men to the north bank of the Douve River at Beuzeville La Bastille.

The group immediately came under intense machinegun fire from guns covering the approaches to the bridge over the river. They returned the fire and destroyed one of the machineguns and its crew.

Shortly four German tanks heading north from the causeway arrived in the area. Ray attacked the tanks with British gammon grenades. He destroyed one tank and killed its crew.

Later in the day, the group was pinned down by heavy fire from a German Infantry Company. Ray quickly organized a defensive position. It was ideal; fire could be placed upon the approaches to the Beureville Bridge over the Douve River, and on the causeway leading to the Merderet River. Because of the effective interdiction fire on the bridge and causeway by the Hummel group, the Germans had to divert daylight traffic away from these important approaches.

For the next five days, the group armed with only rifles and grenades fought off German attacks, inflicting heavy casualties on the Germans.

Meanwhile, the men engaged German traffic approaching the bridge and causeway, denying them use of the roadway except during darkness.

Inspired by Sgt. Hummel, the group fought off all enemy attacks for five days until June 11, 1944 when they were relieved by elements of the seaborne forces that had landed on the Normandy beaches.

By his determination, heroic example and leadership, Sgt. Hummel held the group intact as a fighting force under the most adverse conditions.

The heavily outnumbered men fought without food or medical attention for the wounded. They buried their dead in temporary graves, and fought valiantly without heavy fire support or heavy weapons.

Upon returning to Nottingham, Staff Sergeant Hummel was promoted to First Sergeant of Hq1. He held that position for the duration of the war and his military career.

RAYMOND J. (Ray) HUMMEL Private to First Sergeant

As Hq1 1st Sgt. Raymond Hummel parachuted into Holland September 17, 1944, and in December 1944, he led the company to Belgium where it helped blunt and destroy the last desperate German attack to preserve the Third Reich.

When the war in Europe ended In May 1945,Sgt. Hummel led Hq1 to Heddernheim, Germany where it performed honor guard and security functions for the Supreme, Allied Expeditionary Forces Headquarters located in Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany.

Ray Hummel was loved and respected by the men of Hq1. He and Alice participated in all Hq1 and 508th PIR Association activities.

Ray was a modest, humble, quiet, cheerful and trustworthy individual. He consistently looked after the men of Hq1, and went out of his way to see that exceptional conduct and meritorious service was recognized and rewarded.

Ray Hummel personally maintained a very low profile, seldom if ever taking credit for his accomplishments. One consequence was the failure of Ray's superiors to recognize his achievements and to reward him commensurately.
